HOMES ARE POOLED FOR ECONOMY

England's "War Widows" Forced to Combine Families in Order to Live on Meager Allowances; Move to County

By United Press. London, June 17.—"Pooling" homes is being resorted to by many women whose husbands have gone to the war front, as a means of living with some degree of comfort despite the general heavy reduction in incomes.

More and more of it is likely as fresh groups of married men are called to the colors.

A simple instance the details of which have been published illustrates the system.

The combination was effected by three sisters, all Londoners.

Of the two, one had two children each; the third, three.

Their husbands' incomes had amounted to about $50 weekly each. Their set allowances were about $10 to each of the mothers with two children; a trifle more to the one with three.

On $10 weekly each, it was obvious that these three households, maintained separately, would have to give up everything but the barest necessities of life.

Instead of doing this, they "pooled" resources, moved into the country, where living is considerably cheaper than in London and are living comfortably, though economically. The combined family being rather large on their $50 weekly.

Advocates of the "pooling" system suggest that, as in this case, combinations be formed by groups of relatives or old friends, for the purpose of reducing the possibilities of internal friction.

It is agreed that the existence of a good deal of tact and self-control are called for, in any event, but these have been developed to a remarkable extent in England by the war.

In some groups, of which most consist of two or three families, the work has been systematically divided, one woman acting as nurse, another caring for the housekeeping and a third, in a number of cases, swelling the joint income by outside work.

A good many women with large houses which they could not keep up alone in the breadwinner's absence are taking in the wives and children of other soldiers.

The "pool" affected in this way necessitates at least one establishment and saves several other families from the necessity of cheap hotels or boarding houses.

The experiment is proving so great an economy that some authorities optimistic science believe it will continue to a considerable extent, in a more or less modified form, even after the war.
